A: CycleOps is the 'pioneer' of indoor cycling trainers, which means their software now does a lot of the things they don't get to do because of the setup and design limitations of these products. Dedicated cycling apps are a great way to save data, but they tend to be clunky, complicated, slow to navigate, and hard to use. Video games are expensive to license, complicated to use, and not very precise. Most people want a cheap, easy-to-use, simple-to-navigate, and easy-to-use system, like a toy or a kitchen appliance. CycleOps is designed to be that kind of system, and it's the only one that's also designed to work without electricity. It's not really intended for people who use it extensively, like you. I'd say for a casual user, CycleOps is a good choice. It's not a great choice for people like you, who are likely already happy with something else. Galactocerebrosidase as a biochemical marker for the diagnosis of classical and variant Sandhoff disease. Sandhoff disease (SD) is a progressive neurodegenerative disease caused by the deficiency of beta-hexosaminidase due to a defect in the N-acetylgalactosamine-6-sulfate sulfatase gene (GALNS). Standardized biochemical tests on peripheral blood have been used to diagnose this condition. However, the precise diagnosis of SD is extremely difficult to make, particularly in cases of variants of SD. The biochemical marker used in this study was galactocerebrosidase (GALC), which has been shown to be deficient in SD
