In January, I discussed the way that markets price commodities in relation to the prices of stocks. There are so many different factors that affect these prices, that it's very difficult to rely on them to determine a "true" value for a stock or a commodity. But they do provide one of the keys to understanding a company's true value. And that is the cost of a company's assets. One of the biggest mistakes many people make is assuming that the company is worth the market value of its stock. Yet in the past decade, those companies that were able to reduce their stock values by decreasing their liabilities, increased their companies' market values. Similarly, those companies that had been increasing their net worth had actually been investing money into the companies to grow their assets and increase their market values. This is why it is crucial to identify what those assets and liabilities are and then determine the true value of a company. We are now seeing a similar situation with oil. In the past few months, oil has gotten crushed and is now well below $40 per barrel 82157476af
